I am not having a proper grasp on the concepts and algorithms I am posting these questions. What I am asking is: What I am asking is: What are the steps I am missing in either case or both cases and how can I proceed with the impasse? A: First of all, I think that the end goal is not unreasonable. Looking at images I can see how this is possible, but you're essentially trying to create a 3D printed bust with a thick forehead using images from a monkey and a person. The problem is that the image in the head of the monkey is a two-dimensional representation of a three-dimensional object. You have the correct goal, but I think that you're going about it the wrong way. The first thing to be aware of is that this problem is not well suited for a machine-learning-based solution. You've given it an image that is a 2D representation of a 3D object. Your machine has two problems: it does not know the scale of the monkey head, and it does not know that it is a bust. Instead, I would look to see if a computer vision system such as OpenCV might work for this. Such a system would need to first transform your image into a stack of 2D images (rows for the X, Y, and Z axes), then convert it to gray scale, then cluster the pixels together. You would then have to analyze the clusters that represent the object you are trying to duplicate (such as a head) in order to find the most similar 2D pixels. Based on that you could then form a 3D model of the cluster. Alternatively, you might be able to create a 3D model of the monkey head using 3D printing software. Then you could use that 3D model to create a three-dimensional representation of your 3D printed bust. Hope that helps. Friday, March 7, 2014 In the past couple of years I've had some close encounters with the one thing I've been warned about, and that would be the baleful eye of the dragon and the hungry gator that wants to munch on you. After a few close calls with both, I've made the decision that I'm going to have to stay away from alligators and swamps until I get something else in line to guard myself against. Don't get me wrong, I don't mind being able to handle a little tension now and then. I'm not one
