ISBN: How did our species succeed in the battle for dominance? Why did our foraging ancestors Å . A new paper by an Australian researcher claims it has found evidence of the earliest known life on earth 3.5 billion years ago in South Africa. The research is the first to investigate the possibility of microbial life in hot, neutral and alkaline substrates at that time. Microbial life has dominated Earth since the planet's formation. It has shaped ecosystems and created a habitable environment for living organisms. The earliest life researchers have long been searching for, though, was known as the Great Oxidation Event, which occurred about 2.4 billion years ago and heralded a period of more oxygen-rich conditions on Earth. The search has largely been based on sedimentary rocks, such as those in the Karoo supergroup, which formed over 3 billion years ago. However, the supergroup is now thought to represent partially weathered rocks, leaving scientists searching for a more pristine source. This is the paper's central finding: Discovery of Archaea and Algae at 3.5 Ga in Ironstone Shale of the Karoo Supergroup, South Africa Authors Dominique Néel, Sabrina Esposito, Camille Thérouanne and Nicolas Fedon on behalf of the Cryogenics Research Centre in France, describe finding archaea and algae in the ironstone of the floredzone zone of the Balfour Formation, the carbon-rich rocks of the Kromer Group (3.5-2.9 Ga), South Africa. The sedimentary rocks of the Karoo Supergroup also contain two-thirds to 90 per cent water and are highly alkaline to acidic. Such alkalinity and the ubiquitous presence of water make this environment challenging for life. "Since the return of water to the surface [3.9 billion years ago], our planet has been dominated by life," says Néel, who also contributed to this story for The Conversation. "But these sediments have a very low potential to foster life. The temperatures in these layers are approximately 95°C, and
