Epson L220 Reset Key; Epson L220 waste ink counter is a number of times, to reset ink pad waste counter, Â .Regional differences in the pharmacology and cardiovascular effects of vagal stimulation. The effects of electrical stimulation of the canine vagus on cardiac vagal afferent inputs have been examined. In the atrioventricular, sinus node, and ventricular regions of the heart, vagal stimulation caused a 1:1 post-stimulus onset A-H interval, and the maximal vagal inhibition of cardiac sympathetic afferent innervation varied in the regions from a 17 to 90% decrease. The vagal inhibition of afferent nerve activity was increased at higher mean vagal stimulation frequencies (7.5-10 Hz), but decreasing the vagal stimulus frequency increased the inhibition. After increasing the vagal stimulus frequency, the duration of vagal inhibition was similar in the atrioventricular and sinus node regions, but both were significantly greater than in the ventricular region. The prolonged vagal inhibition of cardiac sympathetic afferent innervation in the atrioventricular and sinus node regions was associated with a decrease in cardiac sympathetic afferent nerve activity and a decrease in cardiac sympathetic efferent activity. Vagal stimulation also inhibited sympathetic neural activity recorded directly, presumably through central mechanisms, in the splanchnic, cerebral, and coronary vasculature and in the heart. The vagal inhibition of sympathetic efferent activity was more variable in the splanchnic, cerebral, and coronary vasculature and heart than vagal inhibition of cardiac sympathetic afferents, and although vagal stimulation caused a decrease in arterial blood pressure, it failed to cause consistent changes in heart rate or arterial blood gases. These observations show that vagal stimulation can produce a significant and prolonged inhibition of cardiac sympathetic afferent innervation in specific regions of the heart and vasculature, and that regional differences in the vagal pharmacology and pharmacodynamics can be observed.

1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to a method for providing and maintaining a query interface in a database system. 2. Description of the Related Art In the following discussion of the invention, a database will be used for illustration and explanation, however, the invention is applicable to a wide variety of database systems. A database may be defined as a structured collection of data maintained in a particular order and readily available for use. The data is organized in such a way as to facilitate rapid, direct access
