The population of the United States is aging rapidly, making it necessary to develop creative ways of enhancing the quality of life of the elderly (1). From the sheer numbers of older individuals who are faced with declining well-being due to the challenges of aging, this suggests the need for a healthy old age. Improved health is a means to achieving this goal, and it is essential to pursue efforts that focus on modifiable health risk factors that are easily targetable. Vascular health and vascular disease are the best-established modifiable risk factors for ischemic heart disease, stroke, and potentially dementia (2). A large body of data is now emerging, which suggests that structural and functional vascular health is strongly associated with cognitive and physical function, where risk-reducing strategies that target these vascular health parameters can reduce the risk of cognitive impairment (3). The better understanding of the pathophysiology of cerebral small vessel disease (cSVD) that can lead to cognitive impairment is also providing new insights into the determinants of cognition in the elderly.
