The CI builds the Mule application with embedded Mule, and the CD is a Gradle build with unit and integration tests. We're using dockerized Mule and Gradle. If the CI step fails, the CD gradle step fails, and thus the new versions in Docker cannot be deployed to the app server because it's still using an old mule version that uses a different version of Mule. The solution we've been considering is to include a try and catch to cut off the Docker deployment if the CI step fails. We've already tried to add the try/catch Mule flow from the docs and this wasn't really working. The example runs a GET request to the Server endpoint but it is a bit cumbersome. We would like to catch an Exception (like Caused by: java.lang.RuntimeException: org.mule.exception.DefaultMessagingException) during the Mule flow that created the exception. Our current code is: @Inject MessageDrivenContext messageDrivenContext; @Override public void run(final String input, final OutputStream out) throws Exception { out.write(input.getBytes()); } @Override public OutboundMessageContext mapMessage(final MuleMessage message) throws Exception { try { 3da54e8ca3
