The goal of this proposal is to understand the role of the intestinal transporter UGT2B in bile acid conjugation. This transporter plays a central role in rendering the primary bile acid cholic acid (CA) and the secondary bile acid chenodeoxycholic acid (CDCA) less toxic to the host. There are only two enzymes known to act on these bile acids: cholesterol 7 alpha-hydroxylase and bile acid Sulfotransferase. Thus, the uptake mechanism for bile acid and its conversion to a less toxic product is a critical determinant of how much bile acid can enter the enterohepatic circulation and how much enters into the portal circulation via the liver. In the current study, we propose to characterize bile acid-transport proteins from the gastrointestinal tract (foregut, midgut, hindgut), including key characteristics of uptake kinetics, concentration dependence, and competitive inhibitors. The kinetics for transport of bile acids will be measured in a process very similar to that previously used to describe conjugated and unconjugated bile acid uptake by the intestine. We will determine whether the transporter is Na⁺-independent (NIS-dependent), and, if so, whether it operates the the xc- or the y-direction. Bile acid uptake will also be measured in brush border membrane vesicles (BBMV) prepared from five rat intestinal segments and the H⁺/bile acid cotransporter of the brush border (BBMV) will be characterized. By binding to the BBM
