Extracorporeal Life Support in the Pediatric Population. Extracorporeal life support (ECLS) is used in the management of pediatric patients with severe cardiopulmonary failure and therefore allows us to ensure time to recover function and prolong life. Reported advantages of ECLS include cardio-pulmonary rescue from cardiopulmonary arrest and bridging to cardiac transplantation, veno-arterial support for severe cardiogenic shock associated with hyperdynamic circulation, extracorporeal membrane oxygenation for cardiorespiratory failure due to neonatal/congenital heart disease, pediatric respiratory support for treatment of severe acute respiratory distress syndrome, and ECLS as a bridge to cardiac transplantation. Complications such as hemolysis, bleeding, and infection can occur during ECLS. Complications can include coagulopathy, bleeding, thrombosis, hemolysis, and hemodynamic instability. Pre-, peri-, and postoperative patient care can impact the development of complication and prognosis during ECLS., Z., & Syer, D. 1996,, 314, L1 Frye, B., & Broadhurst, T. 1998,, 499, 115 Gunn, J.
