He has gone from talking about his ideas, and specifically how and why he would improve the lives of Americans, to describing the success he had raising a family to college and medical school in Utah to help his dad. He did the same thing in the debate, shifting from an opening statement to a defense of the 47 percent of Americans who don't pay federal income taxes to a defense of a so-called joint venture with "the American people." The "joint venture," he explained, would be with "American people who are producing wealth and getting wealth and growing wealth in this country." But now the Romney campaign appears to have gone over the top when it comes to job creation, releasing a jobs plan that they say shows the candidates' economic differences. "Obama plans to destroy up to two million jobs in the next two years through his policies
