 physiological, and histopathological characteristics of the pulmonary impairments in cattle exposed to transient atrazine-induced hyperammonemia. Atrazine-induced hyperammonemia is the result of a perturbation of N-acetylated compounds leading to a rise in ammonia and subsequent respiratory acidosis. The experimental design will be to start feeding Holstein calves with atrazine at 6 weeks of age and then euthanize them at intervals of one to two weeks after the initial dose, depending on animal size. The specific aims of this study are: (1) to determine if calves given atrazine show signs of clinical disease in the form of CNS excitation, depression, loss of appetite, gastroenteritis, or respiratory symptoms; (2) to characterize the clinical, morphological, physiological, and histopathological effects of transient atrazine-induced hyperammonemia in the form of clinical signs, lesions on light microscopic examination, appropriate immunohistochemistry, ventilation, gas exchange, and pulmonary histopathology; (3) to characterize the effects of the atrazine-induced hyperammonemia on neopulation, endocrine status, and immune function as reflected by antibody production, cytological changes, and cellular immune function; (4) to investigate whether calves can be successfully rescued if the time of exposure to atrazine is delayed or the dose is reduced; (5) to develop a quantitative model for predicting the likelihood of clinical toxicity to cattle from transient atrazine-induced hyperammonemia; and (6) to assess the transience of the pulmonary lesions in cattle exposed to transient atrazine-induced hyperammonemia. The knowledge gained in this study will be useful in future toxicologic investigations as well as in 6d1f23a050
