Electric conducting materials. Magnet is a substance in which the material particles are aligned with the magnetic field, along its axis. A magnet is a material that produces a magnetic field. A magnet is a material that produces an attractive or repulsive force on a nearby piece of magnetic material, called a lodestone. A lodestone is a material that produces a magnetic field, which magnetizes any other material placed near it. An object placed next to a magnet will be deflected to either side of its original position, pointing towards or away from the magnet. A magnet is an electrical conductor that can be used to produce large magnetic fields. The effect of magnetism is that a magnetic field exerts a force on nearby matter. A magnetized object is deflected by the force of the magnetic field. Weak magnetism forces apply to all objects, as do stronger magnetic fields. Matter can be magnetized. The process used to make a magnet is magnetic induction. There are three types of magnetization, permanent, induced, and super-induced. Permanent magnetization can be produced by the action of large, long-lived magnets and by electroforming of ferrite and other materials. The magnet is divided into North and South poles. The two poles are distinct and separate. Which is used depends on the orientation of the object. Magnetism is a property of the entire magnet or of parts of it. For instance, a rock does not have magnetism, but iron does. A magnetic field is a property of the Earth, found near the surface, associated with the interaction of the moving charged particles (currents of charged particles moving in the Earth's magnetic field). All magnetic fields, including natural fields such as Earth's, are created by electric currents and result from a balance of electric charges in a frame of reference. The magnetic field of a bar magnet is created by the flow of positive and negative currents along and around the wire in the bars.
