Serial Key: Â .Q: Keep a blob object after an API call with serverless framework I'm trying to make an API call with the serverless framework and I need to keep the data received from the API call.

I've been searching in the internet and i still couldn't find what is the best way to achieve this. My steps have been to do: - Running the API code - At the end of the API call i've put: const {data} = await fetch(` const newobj = await data; // This will create an object with the same structure as the API call but after i will remove the original API call reference to be efficient - If i need to store again in the S3, i will send a POST request - This is the code that i've in my lambda function: const newobj = await data; // store data received from API call await s3.deleteObject({ Bucket: bucket, Key: bucketURL + local_dir + filename }).promise(); delete newobj; This is how the object would look like, after the first API call and before the second API call: Is this the correct approach? Thanks A: This is the right approach. As the documentation states: If you need to store something in S3, you can use this function to store the data to S3: const s3 = new AWS.S3() You can use the data that was saved by this function in your lambda function as follows: const newobj = await data; Mortality and implications for identifying the first 6d1f23a050
