Cholesteatoma is the most common cause of sensorineural hearing loss in children. Five years after the onset of a chronic infection in the middle ear, a tissue called granulation tissue develops and gains the potential to differentiate into bone, as well as other connective tissues and skin. The primary source for the differentiation of skin into the fibrous forms of connective tissue is the extracellular matrix. The pathologic control of the connective tissue forms is usually associated with an abnormality of the extracellular matrix. Thus, an understanding of the structure and biosynthesis of the extracellular matrix is essential for defining normal and abnormal epithelial-mesenchymal interactions in development. The aims of this proposal are to determine the levels of collagen types in granulation tissues in different stages of cholesteatoma differentiation, and to explore and identify growth factors in cholesteatoma. For these purposes, the extracellular matrices are extracted from cholesteatomas at different stages of differentiation using tissue detergents. Collagen types I-V are separated using fibril electrophoresis.

The growth factors are quantitated with column adsorption using specific antibodies and polyclonal antibodies. These studies will provide detailed information on the changes of collagen types and growth factors during different stages of cholesteatoma differentiation. These experiments will provide insight into the role of growth factors in the formation of cholesteatoma.
