The degree to which vision and audition are independent of one another depends on how visual and auditory stimuli differ in their redundancy level. Consider the time when people first learned to speak: although visual and auditory stimuli are redundant, if one cue is lost the other could be recovered almost immediately. Similarly, when new people learn sign language they often can spontaneously interpret between the two modalities.

It is currently unknown what kind of redundancy is required to facilitate cross modal transfer. One possibility is that visual and auditory redundancy are similar, and the cross-modal transfer is facilitated by common auditory-visual experience. The experiments in the current proposal will address the issue of how cross modal cues are processed by asking how auditory cues are recovered when visual cues are simultaneously present in the same modality or when the redundancy is reduced. To this end, the experiments will use a paradigm that we have developed to directly assess cross- modal redundancy. This paradigm allows us to measure the accuracy of auditory recovery when visual stimuli are present. Our experiments will reveal how auditory signals are recovered when visual signals are present, and will identify a critical degree of perceptual similarity. This work may eventually lead to a better understanding of cross- modal processes in the brain and may be applicable to the design of communication interfaces, such as computer-based sign language interfaces.One of the Russian coronavirus victims discovered on the streets of Beijing has died, state media said on Thursday.
