Celiac disease (CD) is an important autoimmune disorder. Adult patients with CD have been reported to experience more infections compared with the general population. The aim of the current study was to determine whether a higher rate of severe sepsis was observed in children with CD and whether this was associated with an increased rate of mortality. We conducted a matched-control study between February 2006 and March 2009. Six- to 16-year-old children with CD were matched 1:1 to healthy controls for sex, age (\pm 3 years), and socio-economic status. Controls for CD were randomly selected from the same community. Patients with CD were followed up prospectively for episodes of severe sepsis. CD was confirmed by means of duodenal biopsy. In total, 32 patients with CD and 31 matched controls participated in the study. Of the 32 patients with CD, 10 (31%) had at least one episode of severe sepsis during follow-up, compared with six controls (19%) ($P = 0.48$). Mortality due to infection was observed in six patients (19%) compared with three controls (9%) ($P = 0.59$). Children with CD did not appear to have an increased rate of severe sepsis or greater mortality compared with the general population.

Other reasons for the increased rate of infection-related morbidity in patients with CD remain to be determined.[Alcoholism and the risk of occupational accidents and injuries in the aged. Analysis of cases reported to the accident insurance company of the Land Baden-Württemberg by people aged 65 and older]. Alcohol abuse is a chronic disease, affecting all age groups. Older people are also a particularly vulnerable group for this disease,
