would make benefits as well as the minimum wage more generous for low earners. The Labour leader told the Observer that he would raise the threshold for the minimum wage to £7.50 an hour and raise in-work benefits for all low earners, including child benefit and housing benefit. Miliband's plans would cost an extra £37bn a year but he said he could find savings by raising taxes on the "top 10%" of earners. "Wherever we can, we would do things like say to the top 5% of people in the country, you need to pay more tax," he said. The prime minister has previously signalled a willingness to raise taxes in the next parliament, but has so far not done so in the way that Miliband has proposed. Labour has so far proposed raising taxes on the bottom 5% of earners - those earning less than £11,500 a year - to the rate paid by the top 10%. Miliband also promised to raise taxes for the top 1%, a move that would involve increasing the top rate of income tax to 50%. The party is understood to have ruled out any plans to increase taxes on earnings above £150,000. Miliband argued that he needed to go further to reach the 50% rate than David Cameron, because the prime minister only pledges to raise taxes on earnings above £50,000.
