In the big cat trade, there's no such thing as a small controversy. After all, big cats are big, and some people's opinions, ideas and agendas are simply out of this world. An Oxford University Press study released on Tuesday by researchers with the Wildlife Conservation Society and American University in Washington of data from 1,467 big cat skins found that the illegal trade in big cats is far more extensive than previously thought. The team found that the actual live big cat trade was anywhere between four and five times the estimated number. The same study found that the number of big cats being held in captivity worldwide is also far higher than previously estimated. The trade in wild cats - mountain lions, jaguars, leopards, snow leopards and servals - are estimated to be worth $200 billion a year, even though fewer than 1,000 of the 3,000 individual species are thought to be in captivity. The trade of captive-bred cats, which include tigers, lions, leopards, servals and jaguars, is also vast. The researchers estimate that the true trade of captive-bred cats is worth $400-500 million a year, with captive-bred big cats accounting for as much as 40-50% of the trade. Even if the big cat trade was only worth $200 billion a year, it would still be the third largest illegal trade after drug and human trafficking. Still, not everyone is in agreement about the issue of big cat trade. While some think that given the resources needed to raise, care for and export captive big cats, that the trade is a clear violation of animal rights, others believe that big cats are destined to be killed anyway and that providing them for the pet trade is the least harmful way to take them out of the wild. Lori Marino, executive director of the Wildlife Protection Society, says that to suggest that the pet trade is not harmful to big cats ignores the real resources needed to provide them with the care, diet and housing they need. "These lives don't come without a cost," she said. "It's very high risk, high reward and
