Infusion of human low-molecular-weight kininogen (LMWK) results in a significant depletion of active kallikrein, the enzyme that converts LMWK into the potent prokallikrein activator LK-1. Pre-exposure to LK-1 attenuates the fall in fibrinolytic activity during LMWK infusion. This suppressive effect of LK-1 is not confined to LMWK-induced fibrinolysis; LK-1 has also been shown to suppress the fibrinolytic response to recombinant tissue plasminogen activator (rt-PA). The underlying mechanism for this suppression is not clear. It seems most likely that LK-1 exerts its effects at sites of co-localization of both LK-1 and kallikrein-related enzymes. Extracellular kallikrein and kallikrein-related enzymes exert their effects by the activation of plasma protease-activated receptors (PARs). Following LMWK infusion the observed hypotensive effects of the bradykinin B2 receptor agonists may be mediated by stimulation of PAR-1. Serine proteases of the kallikrein type (such as kallikrein itself) have been shown to modulate the fibrinolytic system by binding to these receptors
