Since his rise to prominence as leader of the Australian Labor Party from the 2013 leadership election through to the leadership spill of 2015, Bill Shorten has been repeatedly described as populist, even a populist-left leader. Yet in his first term as leader, Shorten has taken the steps necessary to adopt and execute a policy platform firmly aligned with the centre-right of the ALP, the Coalition and modern Liberal politics. On December 1, 2017, as part of its statement of democratic reform, the Liberal National Party committed to implementing electoral reforms to reduce the cost of voting and to increase accessibility of the electoral system. In April 2018, the Coalition Ministers for Electoral Finance and Assurance released the 'Efficiencies in elections' report, which recommended greater use of electronic voting, the expansion of compulsory voting, and indexation of the voting age to age 20. It also proposed removing the present threshold of four weeks' notice for poll closing dates, since it had not been in place since 1998. The Australian Electoral Commission will conduct a review of the threshold for poll closing dates under section 46 of the AEC Act, which is currently 10 weeks' notice for those not holding a Commonwealth position, such as a representative or senator. It is not yet clear whether the review will be undertaken in the federal or state systems. The National Australia Bank indicates that its electors take an average of four weeks to make a final decision on whether or not to vote, but suggests that this time period could be increased to six weeks or a year. The Australian Electoral Commission (AEC) has commenced a review of the Poll Closing Threshold for determining when it should determine poll closing dates. In its July 2017 AEC annual report, the AEC reported that it had undertaken a review of the Poll Closing Threshold based on its Strategic Plan. The AEC decided to increase the Poll Closing Threshold to 14 days for a non-Commonwealth election and for a state or local government election not involving the federal level. In September 2017, a Senate committee inquiry into the Electoral Commission's conduct as the polling agency in the 2016 federal election described the current Polling Date Threshold as reasonable, but said that it should be increased to provide extra time for voters to cast their
